MANNEQUIN

We all know about fashion models, right. They are pale, fragile and kooky. They wilt in sunlight and only thrive for brief periods after midnight. Right? Wrong. Just like they've changed all our biases about music and men's fashions, the English are forcing a revision in our concept of mannequins. The girl on these pages is a most radical anomaly. First of all, she is built. Then she is outgoing: "London would be perfect if it weren't for the bloody fog. The few times the sun shines I cancel my engagements and spend every precious minute outdoors." And unneurotic: "I got my love for the lead from my Russian mother, my love for gentility from my Italian father, and it's all combined with a thoroughly British regard for poise." Her name is Nati Rigetti and she does have one extravagance. She's desperate to get a flat large enough to comfortably house herself and a beautiful Afghan hound named Nelson.
